Silent the Muse consigns to dull decay,
Thousands, that daily sink to mother earth;
That sink obscurely to their kindred clay,
That sink but by condition of their birth.
But when a soul replete with martial fire,
Has from this mortal scene bewinged its flight;
The mournful Muse assumes the sacred lyre,
To sing his merits o'er with sad delight.
To sing the Youth, who left the lap of ease,
Left friendship's dear affection's softest arms;
Bore the rude tumult of tempestuous sea's,
And brave withstood the fiercest war's alarms.
Left Erin's peaceful plains, where comforts flow,
To face her foe in thundering storms of fire;
Smote Erin's dreadful dire, inveterate foe,
And saw him conquer'd, crush'd, subdu'd, retire.
At length with hardships, wounds, and labours worn,
In pain and anguish on his lonely bed;
Behold him laid, in solitude to mourn,
Unnotic'd by the world, for whom he bled.
When fast, oh! fast approaching to his end,
Cheer up he cried, nor longer mourn for me;
Here comes old death! thrice welcome honest friend,
I've seen thee oft—resign'd I strike to thee.
