DEATHS.

Sunday last, at his residence, Bridge-street, after a lingering illness, George Ryan, Esq. Medical Superintendent of the Limerick General Dispensary,—a young Gentleman whose premature death must be a source of deep and lasting affliction to the fond relatives, whom an all-wise Providence has bereft of their dearest stay upon earth; while to the many respectable friends who knew and could appreciate his private worth, it has become one of general and sincere regret. Because, in his person, it is no idle panegyric to say, were happily combined those amiable qualities of mind and heart, which, based upon in-born principle of integrity, give that high moral lustre to individual character, which extrinsic circumstances, however flattering, never can afford. Those natural endowments were enhanced in an eminent degree by his affable manners, winning address, and the advantages of a superior education, so sure to constitute the grace and charm of social life.—Designed for a highly respectable profession, rapid was the indication of his future excellence in the medical art,—and, though called by a severe domestic calamity to take charge, at a comparatively youthful age, of a large public establishment, with an energy and address equal to the crisis he promptly surmounted the peculiar difficulties of his situation, and after years of incessant labour in the service of his fellow-citizens, Death has released him from the trust, but with a character pure and unsullied as when first he entered on its arduous duties. Had Providence but spared him the enjoyment of health to realize the sanguine anticipations of his family and friends, few Practitioners, it may be truly said, were likely to close their mortal race, in the fullness of time, with better claims to that palm which is due to a professional career at once beneficial to the community and honourable to himself. Brief, however, as has been the span of his earthly existence, yet much of good has he accomplished in his wide sphere of action, as the grateful sense of public feeling for departed worth has warmly attested in this mournful event.
