to the Editor of the Limerick Chronicle,

SIR,
The following Character, of the late most cellent Mr. Henry Mosfell, is drawn by a low-Student, who knew him long enough urgently to deplore his loss: By inserting it in e next Publication, you will oblige your servant.

Of his talents, I need not speak—the rewards owed upon him uniformly at the Quarterly sessions, unequivocally declare how bright they were.

Tricely then to say what he was,—possessing the greater virtues of Christianity in the best degree; he had the greatest affection for Friends, without that violent hatred towards enemies, which too often disgraces a mind capable of enthusiastic friendship.

Though, but now at that period of life when he, just emancipated from the more immediate tyranny of Parental authority, rush into fashionable dissipation, he, in spite of the force of example, preserved the highest degree of gaiety without the smallest tincture of profligacy; he —in short he was deservedly and universally loved.

DIED. On Saturday last, aged 33 years, James Francis Sargent, Esq; Son of Francis Sargent, Esq; Alderman of this City.—He had but a few weeks since arrived from Bengal, after an absence of 13 years, and some time before his departure from thence married an English lady, with whom he returned in the fond hope of settling among his Family and Friends in his native city; his kindness and amiability of disposition endeared him to his Family, and an uncommon activity of mind, and purity of principle, must have rendered him a very valuable Member of any Society in which he lived.— They who can conceive the joy and happiness felt at his return, may now form an idea of the sufferings of his solitary Wife, his afflicted Father, and affectionate Family: they who were but just united in joy and happiness in him as the common bond of their hopes and affections, are now sunk together in too deep affliction.
