

good, either for church or state. It is well-known, both in America and Dublin itself, that I have ever opposed secret societies, as the proper discharge of my duties as a prelate required me to do.

Second—The case of the late Terence Bellew M'Manus was introduced in the address, and in reference to that case, the gentlemen presenting the document appeared not to have been acquainted with the facts. I was waited upon by a committee of gentlemen in New-York requesting that the holy sacrifice of the mass might be offered up for the repose of the soul of M'Manus—that his remains, which had just then arrived from San Francisco, should be borne in grand funeral procession through the streets of New York to the cathedral. The first part of the request was granted; the second was peremptorily refused. A testimonial from the Archbishop of San Francisco to the effect that M'Manus had received the last rites of the church while living, was a sufficient warrant to entitle his departed soul to the prayers of the faithful. His remains were decently deposited in the receiving vault of the cemetery until they should be removed. This is all that can be ascribed to me, as the Archbishop of New York. And even this I could not accept as a compliment if, intentionally, or accidentally, it implied any censure upon the conduct of others.

Third—It was obvious that the history of M'Manus and his associates tinged, if I can so express it, the whole conversation. I referred to the bad impressions which calumnies uttered against the prelates and clergy of Ireland had upon my own mind when I was as yet young and uninformed of the full state of the case.

Fourth—What I said of the right of revolution in general, according to Catholic doctrine, I am represented as having said in reference to Ireland in particular. It had no more reference to Ireland than any country. It was based on principles of law, which, if sound, are universal. Belgium had recourse to revolution—and succeeded—because she had observed the conditions laid down by Saint Thomas.—But because Poland and Ireland attempted a revolution, when some, if not all, the conditions to justify such a course were wanting, neither Poland nor Ireland have been successful in their attempt. In this view of the subject, I charged with rashness any attempt which did not hold out a reasonable prospect of success as calculated to confirm the governing power more and more in its authority. But, altogether, what I said on the occasion has been apparently misconceived, or misrepresented, so that the true idea does not appear in the printed report.

I turn from this rather unpleasant topic to the more agreeable duty of making my grateful acknowledgments of the kindness with which I have been received by the clergy and people of the Irish capital, and by their brethren during a brief visit to Killarney; but still more I owe the expression of my grateful feelings to the inhabitants of this beautiful old Cork, from which I take my departure for my home in the west. The people of your city have enabled me to be present at a public banquet, in which I had the pleasure of meeting a very large number of your most respectable citizens. I take it as a personal honour that the Mayor of Cork did not hesitate to preside on the occasion. To him, and to the gentlemen who surrounded him at the festive board, I make my concluding and very sincere acknowledgments.—Respectfully your obedient servant,

+ JOHN, Archbishop of New York.
