Historical and literary representations of Brian Boru’s burial in Armagh, 1014AD

DENIS CASEY

The historical and literary sources for the funeral of Brian Boru are discussed. The choice of Armagh as his final resting place is shown to have had potential advantages both for the church there and for Dál Cais. The various accounts of his burial, with their inconsistencies and omissions, are analysed. Brian’s reputed twelve-night wake is regarded as a possible literary device, intended to link him with St Patrick and thereby enhance his reputation for sanctity.

The name Brian Bórama (Brian Boru) instantly conjures up images of the kingship of Ireland. In the popular imagination Brian is chiefly associated with a supposed Irish national struggle against the Vikings and (with the possible exception of St Patrick) no other medieval Irish figure has been so consistently celebrated and discussed. He has been the subject of a medieval Irish biography, numerous poems, a putative Norse saga (termed Bríon’s saga), much scholarly discussion and the inspiration for a brand of vodka and an opera. The historical and literary Brian is inexorably linked with his pyrrhic victory over a Laigin and Hiberno-Norse force at the Battle of Clontarf on Good Friday 1014, an event that even came to be known in later Norse sources as Brjónsorrostia (‘Brian’s Battle’). As the historical and literary accounts of that battle have recently been analysed in detail, I propose instead to examine the records and circumstances surrounding Brian’s burial in Armagh in the immediate aftermath of the battle, in order to assess the significance of his funeral and the way in which it was recorded in various sources.

Brian’s Burial: the Sources

Descriptions of individual funerals are rare in the Irish annals. Among Brian’s contemporaries only his sometime rival and ally, Máel Sechnaill mac Domnaill, king of

---

1 The opera is by Stanislaus Strange (words) and Julian Edwards (music), Brian Boru: Romantic Opera in Three Acts (Cincinnati, 1896).
2 Máire Ni Mhaoineigh, Brian Boru: Ireland’s Greatest King? (Stroud, 2007) p. 53.
3 For the most recent and detailed discussion of Brian, see Ni Mhaonaigh, Brian Boru.
Tara, was afforded a comparable funeral record in the annals. Unlike Brian’s death, Máel Sechnaill’s end was apparently peaceful and expected and the _comarbaí_ (spiritual and temporal heirs) of Saints Patrick, Colum Cille (Columba) and Ciarán were present when he died at his home in Cró Inis on Loch Ennell. The seventeenth-century Annals of the Four Masters claim that Máel Sechnaill received the Eucharist and unction from _comarba Pátraic_ and afterwards “They sung masses, hymns, psalms, and canticles, for the welfare of his soul”. In the case of Brian we are fortunate that a larger number of records of his funeral exist, although they are terse, open to multiple interpretations and also appear to have been written later than the events they purport to describe. The descriptions of his funeral form the conclusion to a number of accounts of the battle of Clontarf. With regard to that battle, Máire Ní Mhaonaigh has demonstrated that accretions to those reports (for example, additions to the roll call of Brian’s enemies) are quite pronounced. The descriptions of Brian’s burial in Armagh (an incident which is absent from a number of accounts of the battle) may also have been part of the general trend of expanding Brian’s story and add a fitting coda to the career of a friend of that important church.

The succinct, possibly near-contemporary description of the events surrounding Brian’s death found in the Munster Annals of Inisfallen contains no reference to Brian’s posthumous fate, despite the preoccupation of these annals with Brian’s activities during the previous thirty years, though this is in keeping with their laconic style. Similarly, in another important annalistic source, the midlands orientated _Chronicon Scotorum_ (which survives as a seventeenth-century abbreviation of an earlier original), there is no mention of Brian’s burial. Information concerning Brian’s burial is contained in a series of interrelated annals, namely the Annals of Ulster, Annals of Loch Cé, Annals of Boyle (or Cottonian Annals) and Annals of the Four Masters. To these may be added the twelfth-century tale _Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh_ (“The War of the Irish with the Foreigners”), a work of propaganda produced by Brian’s descendants, Uí Briain.

In the seventeenth century Seathrún Céitinn (Geoffrey Keating) did not mention Brian’s burial in _Foras Feasa ar Éirinn_ (although he cites _Cogadh_ as one of his sources for Viking activity in Ireland) and neither did Conall Mac Eochagáin in his Annals of 5 CS, AFM, ACIln s. a. 1022. Eoin O’Flynn has suggested that ‘whether these men were actually in attendance is less important than the image produced of the high-king’s final moments. This tranquil scene of an aged king, surrounded by the greatest churchmen in the country, resting at his crannóg on Loch Ennell, certainly does not reflect the tempestuous nature of Máelsechnaill’s relationship with the church’; ‘The Career of Máelsechnaill II’ in _Riccht na Midhe: Records of the Meath Archeological and Historical Society_, xx (2009) pp 29–68:51.

---

6 AFM s. a. 1022.

7 Ní Mhaonaigh, _Brian Boru_, pp 54–70 and 171–3. The accretion of tradition surrounding the _Battle of Clontarf_ is significant. For example, Colm Ó Lochlainn demonstrated that much of the poetry associated with the battle was written at a much later period: ‘Poets on the Battle of Clontarf’ in _Éigse_, iii (1941–2) pp 208–18 and iv (1943–44) pp 33–47.

8 John Ryan suggested that the entry in the Annals of Inisfallen was written by 1032: ‘The Battle of Clontarf’ in _Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland_, lxviii (1938) pp 1–50:3. He based this opinion on R. L. Best’s and E. MacNeill’s suggestion that the original compilation finished at 1032: _The Annals of Inisfallen: Reproduced in Facsimile from the Original Manuscript (Rawlismon B 563)_ in the Bodleian Library (Dublin, 1933), p. 9. The Annals of Inisfallen only survive in Rawlison B 503, a composite manuscript dating from the eleventh to fifteenth centuries. The text of the Annals of Inisfallen down to 1092 is written by one hand and Best and MacNeill suggested that a change in the chronological apparatus s. a. 1032 (the first occasion in which the year was written out in Irish ‘6 inchoelliguit Crist’ (“from the incarnation of Christ”)), indicated a change in authorship. However, although Best and MacNeill claim that “this style consequently recurs down to 1092, where this first and main scribe suddenly stops”, this formula does not actually reappear until 1034 and does not become a regular feature until 1068.

9 As the closely related Annals of Tigernach are lacunose for the period between 1004 and 1016 inclusive, it is uncertain whether an account of Brian’s burial was included in the original text(s) upon which these two sets of annals are based.

10 James Todd (ed. and trans.), _Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh: the War of the Gaedhil with the Gaill_ (London, 1867); hereafter _Cogadh_.

---
Clonmacnoise (s. a. 1007), which also seems to contain material derived from Cogadh.

Two further, later works, which are largely based on Cogadh, Cath Chuana Tairbh ("The Battle of Clontarf") and Leabhar Oiris ("The Book of Chronicles") do mention Brian’s burial. As the account of the Battle of Clontarf in the latter two sources is largely derivative, they will not be treated in detail here, but some points arising from them will be incorporated in the subsequent discussion. In the early nineteenth century George Petrie recorded that tradition at Kilmainham held that Brian or Murchad was buried there. Part of this tradition seems to have come from "the Munster book of battles, by Mac Liag". This text appears to have been correctly identified by Edward O’Reilly as Leabhar Oiris and thus it is unlikely to contain any unique and genuine information.

Accounts of the Burial

The following account of Brian’s burial is found at the end of the description of the battle of Clontarf in the Annals of Ulster:

Mael Muire son of Eochaid, successor of Patrick, with his venerable clerics and relics, came moreover to Sord Coluim Chille, and brought away the body of Brian, king of Ireland, and the body of his son Murchad, and the head of Conaing and the head of Mothla, and buried them in Ard Macha in a new tomb (in aicillath nui). For twelve nights the community of Patrick waked the bodies in honour of the dead king (Di aithch dheac immorro do samhadh Patraicc ic are na corp propter honorem regis possit).

The description of the battle of Clontarf in the Annals of Loch Cé is clearly not contemporary (as additions to the list of obituaries and its saga like material indicate) and its tone and description of supernatural incidents are comparable to the twelfth-century Cogadh. The Annals of Loch Cé’s description of the battle of Clontarf ends with an account of Brian’s burial, which is remarkably similar to that found in the closely related Annals of Ulster:

Maelmuire, son of Eochaidh, i.e. the comarb of Patrick, came, truly, with seniors and relics, to Sord-Cholmu-Chille, and bore from thence the bodies of Brian and his son Murchadh, and the head of Conaing, and the head of Mothla, which he

---

11 For Céitinn’s account of the battle see Foras Feasa ar Éirinn le Seathrén Céitinn, D. D., eds and trans. Pádraig Dinnane and David Comyn (4 vols, London, 1901–13) iii, pp 266–77. For his explicit naming of Cogadh as one of his sources, see ibid., iii, pp 156–7.

12 Compare, for example, Mag Eochagán’s account of the drowning of Murchad’s son, Tairdelbach/Terence, in the weir at Clontarf, with that of Cogadh, pp 192–3.

16 Edward O’Reilly, ‘A chronological account of nearly four hundred Irish writers, commencing with the earliest account of Irish history, and carried down to the year of our lord 1750...’ in Transactions of the Ibero-Celtic Society, i (1820) p. lxx (s. a. 1015). In Cogadh (pp 150–1) Kilmainham is identified with the green of Ath Cliath and was burned by Dáil Cais prior to the Battle of Clontarf (pp 154–5). As the army was said to have encamped on the green of Ath Cliath immediately after the battle, according to Cogadh (pp 210–11), it may be possible that this was the reason that Cath Chuana Tairbh and Leabhar Oiris contain an expanded account of the army’s activities at Kilmainham.

17 AU 1014.2.

18 Ni Mhaonaigh, Brian Boru, p. 60.
buried at Ard-Macha, in a new grave (a nioluid nui). Two nights, moreover, was he, with the congregation of Patrick, waking the bodies, propter honorem regis positī (Di aithche, umorro, dhúasam ocus do thsamad Padraig ag ainne na georp propter honorem regis positī).

The Annals of Boyle (a text very closely related to the Annal of Loch Cé) claim:

Brian son of Cennétig son of Lorcán, high-king of Ireland and the foreigners, fell in the battle of Cluain Da Tarb, together with Conaing son of Donn Cuan, Murchad son of Brian, and Toirdelbach son of Murchad son of Brian. And the guardians of the Staff of Jesus (mair na Bachla Isu) immediately carried their bodies to Armagh, where they were buried honourably, with much dignity and reverence.

This account makes no mention of Mothla, king of Déisi Muman, and may imply that Tairdelbach’s body was also taken to Armagh. The Annals of Boyle also differ from the other accounts with regard to the progression of the corpses and possibly the identity of their bearers (see below).

The account of the battle found in the great seventeenth-century Franciscan compilation known as the Annals of the Four Masters contains the following description of the funeral:

Maelmuire, son of Eochaidh, successor of Patrick, proceeded with the seniors and relics to Sord-Choluim-Chille; and they carried from thence the body of Brian, King of Ireland, and the body of Murchad, his son, and the head of Conaing, and the head of Mothla. Maelmuire and his clergy waked the bodies with great honour and veneration; and they were interred at Ard-Macha in a new tomb (in alaidh nui).

It is noticeable that although Mícheál Ó Cléirigh (one of the Four Masters) had transcribed Cogadh in 1628 and again in 1635, this account of Brian’s burial does not parallel that found in Cogadh. Rather the account in the Annals of the Four Masters (which was written between 1632 and 1636) bears a closer resemblance to that of the Annals of Ulster and the Annals of Loch Cé and may well have drawn on sources similar to those texts. There is, however, one noticeable difference; unlike the latter two sources it does not specify the duration of Brian’s wake.

Moving to the non-annalistic accounts, the most important is Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh, which, in the words of John Ryan, ‘is not a simple record of events, but a romantic tale, in which heroes shine and villains play their sinister parts and dramatic incidents are invented or exaggerated for the benefit of the reading public, all the while the interests of the Dál Chais are kept well before the writer’s mind’. The description of 19 ALC, s. a. 1014. For ‘regis positī’ the manuscript on which Hennessy based his edition has ‘regis positi’: ALC, i, 13, n. 2.

---

21 A Boyle, s. a. 1014.
22 AFM, s. a. 1013.
23 These dates are found in the colophon to the B manuscript (1635) of Cogadh, which is the only one of the three manuscripts to contain the account of Brian’s burial: Cogadh, p. xiv.
24 Ryan, ‘The Battle of Clontarf’, p. 3. Despite these perceptive comments, Ryan proceeded to take much of Cogadh’s testimony at face value.
Brian’s burial in Cogadh is cast in the form of a prophecy by Brian. According to that text, various omens and visions combined to indicate that Brian’s death was imminent, these being the appearance of an otherworldly woman on the night before the battle, which Brian described to his servant, Laidean:

‘For, Aibhell, of Craig Liath, came to me last night’, said he, ‘and she told me that I should be killed this day; and she said to me that the first of my sons I should see this day would be he who should succeed me in the sovereignty; and that is Donnchadh; and go thou, Laidean’, said he, ‘and take these steeds with thee and receive my blessing; and carry out my will after me, viz., my body and my soul to God and to Saint Patrick, and that I am to be carried to Ard-macha; and my blessing to Donnchadh, for discharging my last bequests (m o cheinnaiti) after me, viz., twelve score cows to be given to the Comharba of Patrick, and the Society of Ard-macha; and its own proper dues (a dhuthacht féin) to Cill da Lua, and the churches of Muminain; and he knows that I have not wealth of gold or silver, but he is to pay them in return for my blessing and for his succeeding me. Go this night to Sord, and desire them to come to-morrow, early, for my body, and to convey it from thence to Damhlag, of Cianan; and then let them carry it to Lughmihagh; and let Maelmuire Mac Eochadha, the Comharba of Patrick, and the Society of Ard-macha come to meet me at Lughmihagh’.

The description of the subsequent fulfillment of Brian’s prophecy is succinct: ‘Brian was met, as he had directed; and he was taken to Ard-Macha, and Murchadh along with him; and Donnchadh paid in full their bequests (a ccendaithe), and fulfilled Brian’s will after him as he had himself directed’.

The narration of this incident in Cogadh reflects another great contemporary Middle Irish tale on the death of a king, Togail Bruiadhe Da Derga (‘The Destruction of Da Derga’s Hostel’). In both these tales the king accurately prophesies concerning his impending death. This does not necessarily ‘spoil the ending’ but rather personalises the narrative, enabling the audience to empathise with the predicament of the protagonists. The author of Cogadh, through casting the description of the funeral as a prophecy by Brian, was able to portray Brian as a pious figure concerned for his soul, the correct treatment of various churches and the welfare of his kingdom.

Reasons for Brian’s Burial in Armagh

From Armagh’s point of view it may have been deemed important to secure Brian’s remains and those of his principal followers, for a number of reasons. Firstly, there may have been an element of gratitude involved, as Brian had been a notable friend of Armagh. He had overseen the confirmation of Patrician claims to certain ecclesiastical dues, presented twenty ounces of gold to Armagh in 1005, granted other unnamed demands to comarba Pádraig (Mael Muire) while on circuit in 1006, gave Patrician

26 Cogadh, pp 210–11.
27 Eleanor Knott (ed.), Togail Bruiadhe Da Derga (Dublin, 1936).
29 AU 1005 7, CS, AFM s. a. 1005.
30 AU 1006 4. This circuit is also reported, without mention of Mael Muire’s demands, in AI 1006 2, CS s. a. 1006 and AFM s. a. 1005.
churches immunity on subsequent hostings and arranged for a raid to avenge the violation of Patrician relics. Mael Muire was comarba Patraic during all these events and it is quite possible that he may have formed a friendship (or at least a close working relationship) with this generous and powerful benefactor and may have felt obliged to provide Brian with an honourable burial.

Secondly, financial considerations may have dictated Armagh’s desire to secure Brian’s body. They may have hoped that by according Brian an honourable burial they would secure death dues. According to Cogadha, Brian promised twelve score (240) cows to Armagh, though it was up to Donnchad to arrange the payment. In earlier Irish law texts the value of a milch cow was generally equated with one ounce of silver. If the general early medieval ratio for the value of gold to silver (1:12) is adopted, Brian’s gift of 240 cows was equivalent in value to the twenty ounces of gold he had previously granted to Armagh in 1005. The precise natures of Brian’s payments, in both instances, are unclear. According to Cogadha Brian called his final payment mo cheimmaithe. Colman Etchingham has demonstrated that ceannaithe may loosely refer to the effects of the dead, to a bequest or even ecclesiastical dues in general.

In several contexts, ceannaithe is expressed in cattle, namely bó ceannaithe (‘cow of last payment’), which appears to be part of a death due or burial charge. Although ceannaithe is used in Cogadha, the amount is far in excess of the single cow prescribed in other sources. Alternatively, even though ceannaithe is the word used in Cogadha, the payment may have been envisaged as a lump sum given to a church (or possibly churches) on the death of an individual. According to Corus Bescnait (‘Regulation of Proper Behaviour’), an Old Irish law text written well before Cogadha and before Brian’s lifetime, the sum which members of each rank in society are normally expected to bequeath to the Church on their death corresponds to their honour price. 240 cows, however, far exceeds the honour price of twenty-eight cumala (eighty-four cows) accorded to the highest rank of king recognised in Middle Irish legal commentaries, ri Ethenn cen fressarba (‘king of Ireland without opposition’).

Furthermore, since Brian supposedly stipulated that other dues were to be paid to Cell da Lua (Killaloe) and other unnamed churches in Munster, the author of Cogadha appears to have portrayed Brian ultimately disposing of an even greater sum. A different word, duithraithc, is used for these other dues, which may suggest that two different types of payment were envisaged. According to Cogadha, Donnchad paid ceannaithe for both...
Brian and Murchad (a ccendatiae) when their bodies were taken to Armagh. It is conceivable that cennaithe was understood as a burial due (rather than a bequest), but it is impossible to be certain, as no details of Murchad’s will (timna) are given.\footnote{Murchad is said to have made a will as he lay dying after the battle: Cogadh\textsuperscript{2}, pp 196–7.}

Armagh may also have been looking towards the long term and the honours accorded to Brian may have been a means of flattering Brian’s descendents, in the hope of a continued alliance with Dál Cais. In a study of burial in medieval Ireland, Susan Leigh Fry has stated that ‘Even if we had no other record regarding Brian’s life and exploits, the accounts of his burial alone are enough to clearly indicate his pre-eminent status and unique position in Irish history’.\footnote{Susan Fry, \textit{Burial in Medieval Ireland, 900–1500} (Dublin, 1999) p. 89.} The status of the subject of the obsequies, however, is only one aspect of the social pressures that dictate the scale of human funerary rites. In opposition to Fry’s claims, socio-anthropological interpretations of funerals should be considered, such as those of Edmund Leach, who argued that ‘if graves are in any way an index of social status it is the social status of the funeral organisers as much as the social status of the deceased that is involved … [and it is] a rather naive assumption that the scale and quality of a funeral is an expression of the status of the deceased rather than a complex reflection of the circumstances in which the survivors find themselves as the result of a death’.\footnote{Edmund Leach, ‘Discussion’ in Barry Burnham and John Kingsbury (eds), \textit{Space, Hierarchy and Society: Interdisciplinary Studies in Social Area Analysis} (Oxford, 1979) pp 119–24:122.} The scale of the funeral may have reflected Armagh’s desire to further ingratiate themselves with Dál Cais, with whom they appear to have been building links for a number of decades. Brian’s brother and predecessor, Mathgamain, had helped settle a dispute between the comarba of Ailbe (of Emly) and Patrick (Dub dá Leithe), in favour of the latter while he was visiting Munster.\footnote{Al 973.3.} Furthermore, Armagh appears to have had a representative in Munster during Brian’s career, Tuathal ua Mail Macha (\textit{ob.} 1007) and Brian was very favourable to Armagh during his own lifetime, as noted above.

Dál Cais may also have had reasons to desire Brian’s burial in Armagh. His burial there would have facilitated a continued alliance with the Patrician community, which might have appeared useful for counteracting similar alliances between various branches of the Eóganachta and important Munster churches (who may have previously proved hostile to Dál Cais interests).\footnote{Brian appears to have previously found it necessary to coerce some churches that were connected with the Eóganachta, namely Cork and Emly. See the discussion of the burial of Moshla, son of Dormall, below.} Furthermore, the network of Patrician churches stretched throughout Ireland and Dál Cais may have thought it expedient to maintain links with an organisation that had influence in the territories of both potential allies and enemies alike. From a propagandistic point of view, the burial of the man who aspired to the title \textit{Imperator Scotorum} (‘Emperor of the Irish’), by the premier church of Ireland, was certainly an event that Dál Cais could promote in their favour (as indeed they subsequently did, in \textit{Cogadh}). Finally, the perceived spiritual benefits of being buried in Patrick’s chief church cannot be ignored.

It is difficult to assess whether the funeral may be classified as an Armagh-controlled affair, a Dál Cais political showpiece or the result of a convergence of their respective interests. The most detailed discussion of the funeral is in a Dál Cais document (\textit{Cogadh}), yet there is no evidence to suggest that any living person from Brian’s army accompanied the bodies and heads of the slain to Sord Cholui Cille (Swords, Co. Dublin), Damliag Cianán (Duleek, Co. Meath), Lugmad (Louth) or Armagh in the years following the battle.
some may have done so cannot be ruled out). Indeed, Cogadh implies that the Dál Cais army had their hands full simply trying to get back to their own territory. An attempted revolt by the Éoganacht contingent of their army and constant harrying by Oisínge troops placed the Dál Cais army in peril on the long march home. Of course that narrative was most likely constructed to demonstrate the bravery of the Dál Cais troops – mortally injured men who suffocated with blood and returned to the fray to assist their endangered comrades – rather than furnish the itinerary of their post-battle journey. Nonetheless, the annals make it clear that Dál Cais were subsequently placed under considerable pressure over the course of 1014. Domnach and Tadc, Brian’s most prominent surviving sons, fought against each other in a battle in which Tadc was victorious. Furthermore, Domnach killed Cathal mac Domnaill, rigdanna of Úi Echach Muman and fought a battle against Domnall son of Dub dá Báirenn, which suggests that Dál Cais had to contend with substantial Éoganacht opposition within Munster.

Regardless of whether the initiative for the funeral came from Armagh or Dál Cais, the community of Armagh was careful to record the obsequies. It is clear from the surviving annals that the funeral is only mentioned in those collections which incorporate an Armagh-based annalistic text for this period of their record (Annals of Ulster, Annals of Loch Cé, Annals of Boyle and Annals of the Four Masters). In contrast, those annalistic texts which are not dependent upon an Armagh text during this period (Annals of Inisfallen, Chronicron Scotorum and Annals of Clonmacnoise) do not contain accounts of the funeral, even though they do record the battle. The relationship between the account of the funeral found in Cogadh and that found in the Armagh-based annals is unclear and there are actually few parallels between the two sources.

The Removal of the Bodies
According to all the texts quoted above (except the Annals of Boyle), the bodies were initially taken to Sord Cholm Cille and subsequently to Armagh. It is possible that the bodies may even have been interred in Sord first before Mael Muire obtained them and that the accounts of their postmortem movements represent attempts by the various churches to secure the right to bury them, though this cannot now be proven. Sord Cholm Cille’s name implies that it was a church dedicated to Colm Cille (Columba), but the translation of the bodies from a Columban church to a Patrician church need not 48 Cogadh, pp 212–17.

49 AU 1014.6, CS, ALC s. a. 1014, AFM s. a. 1013.
50 AU 1014.5, A1 1014.5, CS, ALC s. a. 1014, AFM s. a. 1013. AU and ALC claim that Cathal was king of Úi Echach. Chronicron Scotorum, however, notes that Domnach took hostages from Domnall (Cathal’s father) which supports the Annals of Inisfallen’s claim that Cathal was rigdanna and not king (though AI simply claims Cathal died).
51 AU 1015.1, A1 1015.2, CS, ALC s. a. 1015, AFM s. a. 1014. AU and ALC claim that Domnach was the sole victor. Chronicron Scotorum and AFM claim that Domnach and Tadc were joint victors. AI state that Domnall fell in battle against ‘the son of Brian’ (‘mace mBlainr’), which is undoubtedly a scribal error for ‘the son of Brian’, the sobriquet by which Domnach subsequently became known in the annals.
52 Gwyn, followed by Mac Niocaill, suggested that the Armagh annalistic text that informed the content of the Annals of Ulster and the Annals of Loch Cé extended down to 1189: Mac Niocaill, Medieval Irish Annals, p. 29. The relationship between the Annals of Loch Cé and the Annals of Boyle, while close, is not entirely clear. Daniel McCarry has suggested that the primary source for the Annals of Boyle was an Armagh-Derry chronicle that was collated with a Clonmacnoise chronicle in the early thirteenth century: Daniel McCarty, The Irish Annals: their Genesis, Evolution and History (Dublin, 2008), pp 223–44 (summary on pp 243–4).
53 Ni Mhacnáin has demonstrated that the author(s) of Cogadh do not appear to have had access to the surviving version of the Annals of Ulster when they compiled their catalogue of Viking activity: Cogad Gáedel re Gallaibh and the annals: a comparison’ in Eriu, xlvii (1996) pp 101–26:107–10 and 116.
be interpreted as a hostile act on the part of the clergy of Armagh.\(^{54}\) It is reasonable to suggest that the communities of Patrick and Columba in Ireland were on good terms and relatively closely linked during the late tenth and early eleventh century. Mael Muire’s uncle, Dub da Leithe (ob. 998), was both Comarba Pátraic and Comarba Coluin Chille, while a contemporary, Muiredach mac Cricháin, was both comarba Coluin Cille and fer lèigind (head of the monastic school) of Armagh only three years before Brian’s death.\(^{55}\)

Regardless of whether Dál Cais decided to deposit the bodies there or whether the community of Sord actively sought them out, Sord, at first glance, appears to have been an unlikely location for Brian’s first or final resting place. Sord, the site of a bishopric, was located in the territory of Fine Gall and may have been associated with the ruling dynasty of Dublin, against whom Brian had fallen in battle.\(^{56}\) In 994 Máel Sechnaill mac Donnall, king of Tara, had burned Sord\(^{57}\) and the Annals of Ulster explicitly state that Máel Sechnaill’s grandson, Conchobor, plundered and burned Sord, in revenge for an attack on Ard Breccáin (Ardbraccan, Co. Meath) by Sitric mac Amlaíb, king of Dublin.\(^{58}\) Nonetheless, Edel Bhreathnach suggests, ‘It was no coincidence, however, that one of Brian’s wives and mother of Tadc mac Bráin, Echraid daughter of Carrlus mac Ailella, belonged to Ui Ædha Odha, an important local family’.\(^{59}\) Máire Ní Mhaoileain has suggested that this marriage alliance probably dated from the 990s, as by this period Brian was actively involved in the affairs of the midlands and Tadc, the product of this alliance must have been born prior to the turn of the millennium if he was old enough to fight in 1014.\(^{60}\) The initial transfer of the bodies to Sord, a church that may have been friendly with Tadc’s maternal kin, may suggest that Tadc initially directed the funeral arrangements. Unfortunately this is impossible to ascertain, for as ambiguous as Donnchad’s activities around Easter 1014 were, Tadc is wholly absent from the record, as are Ui Ædha Odha. The most detailed account (that found in Michél Ó Cléirigh’s seventeenth-century copy of Cogadh) technically does not claim that Donnchad was responsible for the funeral, as Brian entrusted Laidean (a figure of questionable historicity) with the funeral arrangements and simply declared that Donnchad was to discharge the subsequent payments. Indeed, if Brian’s will was carried out as he directed, then his body would have been sent on its way the morning after the battle (Saturday morning), before Donnchad returned on Sunday evening.

As noted above, Cogadh claims that the bodies were taken to Sord, Damliag Cianáin, Lugmad and finally to Armagh. Both Damliag Cianáin and Lugmad also appear to have been notable churches.\(^{61}\) Damliag Cianáin was said to have been founded by Cianán, a \(^{54}\) The earliest reference to Sord in the annals is to a raid on it, by Mael Sechnaill mac Donnall, in 994, see below. It is possible that a reference to ‘Cill Suairid Indescriut Breghi’ (‘The Church of Sord in Southern Brega’) in a ninth-century Life of Briht refers to the same church, which may then have been associated with that saint; Mairé Herbert, Jona. Kells and Derry (Oxford, 1988) p. 281, n. 357.

\(^{55}\) AU 1011.1. Arguments could and did erupt over burials. The Columban church of Derry and the Patrician church of Armagh disagreed over the burial of a subsequent king of Ireland, Muirchertach Mac Lochlainn, but in that case it was because the Columban community felt Mac Lochlainn did not deserve a Christian burial (AU 1166.10).

\(^{56}\) For the bishopric, see CS, AFM s. a. 1023.

\(^{57}\) AU 994.3.

\(^{58}\) AU 1035.6, ALC, AFM, s. a. 1035.

\(^{60}\) Ní Mhaonaigh, Brian Boru, p. 32. Brian appears to have had a subsequent wife, Dub Choblaig, daughter of Cathal mac Conchobair, king of Connacht; ibid., pp. 32–3.

\(^{61}\) In both Cath Chuma Tarbh (ed. Mac Neill, p. 43) and Leabhar Oirth (ed. Best, p. 90) it is incorrectly called Damliag Cianán, in their descriptions of the removal of the bodies, although it is correctly called Damliag Cianán, in Brian’s direct speech in Leabhar Oirth (ibid., p. 88). This may have been the result of a simple scribal slip of ‘r’ for ‘n’ in the source behind these two related texts.
supposed associate of St Patrick and in the first half of the tenth century its bishop and scribe, Tuathaín mac Aenacain, was also ‘Steward of Patrick’s community south of the mountain’. It was clearly an important church, as the obits of comarba Cianáin are recorded between the late eighth and late eleventh centuries and it was later chosen as the site of a bishopric, at the reforming synod of Ráith Bressail (1111). In contrast to Sord, it does not appear to have been within Fine Gall, as the Gall (presumably of Dublin) raided it within a decade of the Battle of Clontarf. Lugmád was also associated with a disciple of St Patrick (Mochta) and its abbots were occasionally associated with other monasteries, including Damleig Cianáin. In common with Damleig, it also had a bishop and scribe (Finnachta mac Echtigern) who was ‘Steward of Patrick’s community south of the mountain’ in the first half of the tenth century.

The Annals of Boyle, however, differ from all the above texts concerning the passage of the bodies and their conveyors. As quoted above, they claim: ‘The stewards of the Staff of Jesus (maír na Bachta Isu) immediately carried their bodies with them to Armagh and they buried them honourably and with noble veneration there’. The existence or identities of stewards of Bachall Isu at the beginning of the eleventh century are unknown. According to the seventeenth-century Annals of the Four Masters, a maor Bachta Isusa (‘Steward of the Staff of Jesus’), named Flann ua Sínáig, died in 1135, and he may well have been a hereditary keeper of that relic. If such hereditary keepers did exist at the time of Brian’s death, they may have been related to the comarba Pátraic, Máel Muire, as both Máel Muire and Flann ua Sínáig (the later máer) were members of Clann Sínáig, the ecclesiastical dynasty that controlled Armagh. Alternatively, they may have been connected with the maír muinteré Pátraic (‘Stewards of the Community of Patrick’). It is possible that these stewards (and the Staff of Jesus) may have been among the ‘seniors and relics’, which accompanied Máel Muire, according to the Annals of Ulster, Annals of Loch Cé and Annals of the Four Masters.

Brian’s wake: twelve nights or two?

The correspondence between the entries for Brian’s burial in the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé is considerable. The similarity between the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé entries is unsurprising, for as Gearóid Mac Niocaill pointed out ‘It has long been known that from the starting point of LI [Annals of Loch Cé 1014–1131] in 1014 down to the first years of the thirteenth century, U [Annals of Ulster] and LI have a common core of material’. This observation certainly holds true for the entries in both texts under the year in which Brian’s death was recorded. Such is the close concordance

---

62 AU 929.1.
64 AFM s. a. 948. A previous such steward was located at Tremit (Trevit) (AU 888.3). It may be possible that this position was rotated among important Patrickian churches in the midlands.
65 ABally s. a. 1014.
66 AFM s. a. 1135. The earliest record of Bachall Isu concerns its violation by Donnedad mac Donnraid, Clann Cholmán king of Tara, at an déach at Ráith Anhíth (AU 789.7). According to the possibly tenth-century Tripartite Life of Patrick (Vita Timpirtica), which postdates that event, Patrick received the staff while sojourning in the Mediterranean, prior to his mission in Ireland: Kathleen Mulchrone (ed.), Beith i Fhataic: the Tripartite Life of Patrick (Dublin, 1939) pp 18–19.
67 Mac Niocaill, The Medieval Irish Annals, p. 29.
of the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé under 1014 that ten of the eleven entries in the Annals of Loch Cé are shared with the Annals of Ulster (though the description of the battle of Clontarf is much longer in the former). These ten entries occur in the same order in both texts; the probability of the same order occurring independently is negligible. Furthermore, the close lexical and syntactical parallels for a number of these entries, including the section on Brian’s burial, confirm that they drew on a common source. In light of these close parallels between the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé it is necessary to seek an explanation for the discrepancy in length between the twelve-night wake described in the Annals of Ulster and the two-night wake described in the Annals of Loch Cé. A clue to the origin of this discrepancy may be found in Trinity College Dublin MS 1282 (formally H. 1. 8), the primary manuscript of the Annals of Ulster.

MS 1282 (siglum H), was written by Ruaidhrí Ó Luinín (whose hand has also been assigned the siglum H) for Cathal Mac Maghnusa, as far as 1489 and continued by subsequent scribes as far as 1510. The other manuscript of the Annals of Ulster is Rawlinson B 489 (siglum R), a copy of H, of which the entries between 952 and 1506 were also written by Ó Luinín. Manuscript H has Di aídhche dhéic immorro (‘twelve nights, moreover’) as the length of the wake. The dhéic in Manuscript H was an interlinear addition, in a hand given the siglum H1. Daniel Mc Carthy, the only scholar to posit an identity for H1, has suggested that H1 was also Ó Luinín, subsequently correcting his text. Whether or not this identification is correct, Ó Luinín did write Di aídhche dhéic immorro (‘twelve nights, moreover’) in Manuscript R.

The Annals of Loch Cé, however, have Di aídhche, umorro (‘two nights, moreover’), the same as Ó Luinín originally wrote in Manuscript H, before he (or someone else) altered it to ‘twelve nights’. This leads to the question of whether the Armagh parent text behind both the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé recorded a two-night or a twelve-night wake. In the later texts Cath Cluana Tairbh and Leabhar Oiris it is also claimed that Brian had a twelve-night wake, which suggests that the authors of these sources not only drew on Cogadh, but possibly also on a version of the Armagh annalistic text. Fry has suggested that the Annals of Loch Cé’s record of a two-night wake may be a scribal error, as ‘twelve-day wakes seem to be connected with people of high status, and thus appear to have specific social connotations’, but her reasoning is flawed and it is by no means 68 The Latin phrase proprius hænorum regis possit at the end of the Irish entry in both the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé may be a common formula or may suggest that their parent text was itself a composite document, which drew on sources written in both Irish and Latin.

69 Almost all scholars who have mentioned the funeral follow the twelve-night wake of the Annals of Ulster. The notable exception is Ni Mhánaigh, who has followed the Annals of Loch Cé’s reading: Brian Boru, pp 59–60.

70 AU, pp viii–ix.

73 This may be seen in the online image of Rawlinson B 489 f. 3r at Early Manuscripts at Oxford University (http:// image.ox.ac.uk/show?collection=bodleian&manuscript=msrawlb489) (17 Feb. 2010).

75 Fry, Burial in Medieval Ireland, p 83. Fry cites Plummer’s Vita Sanctorum I., cxix–cxl (recte cl) as proof that ‘Other Irish sources also mention ‘wakes’ which continued for seven and eight days, with twelve-day wakes recorded for men of especially high status’; op. cit., p 81; Charles Plummer (ed.), Vita Sanctorum Hibernicarum (2 vols, Oxford, 1910), i, pp cxxix–cxl (recte cl). The reference is erroneous. Plummer does not mention wakes at this point: his only reference to them is a comment that, in the Lives, ‘The burial customs of the Irish are vividly portrayed, unrestrained lamentation for the dead, the keening, which is regarded as somewhat heathenish, as is also the prolonged wake’: ibid., p cix. Of the six people that Fry claims had twelve-night wakes (excluding Brian), three did not (see n. 78, below).
clear why the Annals of Ulster should be given priority over the Annals of Loch Cé in this instance, especially considering the annotations to Manuscript H discussed above.

From a practical point of view a two-night wake appears to be a more likely occurrence than a twelve-night wake, given the inevitable post-mortem decomposition of the bodies/decapitated heads, which would have been further exacerbated by the extra amount of time necessary to transfer them from Clontarf to Armagh. It is not impossible, however, that the Armagh parent text may have originally contained a record of a twelve-night wake, regardless of whether one actually occurred (it need not be expected that the earliest source was necessarily truthful). Twelve-night wakes appear in earlier literature and it is noticeable that in Vita Tripartita (an earlier Life of Armagh’s patron saint), Patrick also had a twelve-night wake: ‘And for the duration of twelve nights (fri ré dá aidchí deacca), i.e. the time during which the elders of Ireland were waking him with hymns and psalms and canticles, there was no night in Mag níl níthes, but angelic light there’.

Similarly, in a later Life, a late-twelfth/early-thirteenth-century Life of Barra, it is claimed that God did not let the sun set for twelve days after Barra’s death, while the clergy of Desmunn were performing their ceremonies. It is quite possible that the descriptions of these twelve-night wakes are imitations of Vita Tripartita and, in the case of Brian, part of the process by which he was attributed saintly characteristics.

Brian’s fellow Internees and Tomb

Brian was not the only internee in Armagh after the battle of Clontarf. A number of the sources claim that one of his sons, Murchad, was buried with him, along with the heads

---

76 For a variety of reasons medieval scholars generally treat the text of the Annals of Ulster as the most reliable annalistic record of medieval Irish history. These reasons include its preservation by early linguistic forms, the comprehensiveness of its record, its outwardly uncomplicated chronological apparatus and more recently the quality of Mac Ain and Mac Niocaill’s edition (to 1131). Unfortunately, this occasionally leads scholars to forget that the Annals of Ulster is sometimes inaccurate and has its biases, like every other annalistic compilation.

77 Betha Phthairic, ed. Mulchrone, p. 149. My translation. This was ultimately based on Muirchú: Ludwig Bieler (ed. and trans.), The Petitionary Texts in the Book of Armagh (Dublin, 1979) pp 118–19. In a Middle Irish homily on Patrick, that saint is said to have been waked for a night by angels before being waked for twelve nights by men: Whitley Stokes (ed. and trans.), Three Middle-Irish Homilies on the Lives of Saints Patrick, Brigit and Columba (Cork, 1882), pp 44–5. In the Life of Patrick in the Book of Lismore he is said to have been given a twelve-night wake by men but not by angels: Whitley Stokes (ed. and trans.), Lives of Saints from the Book of Lismore (Oxford, 1890), pp 19 and 167. Many saints’ Lives contain heavenly phenomena that supposedly occurred at the time of the saints’ deaths. For a list of these Lives, see Dorothy Bray, A List of Motifs in the Lives of the Early Irish Saints (Helsinki, 1982), p. 119.

78 Pádraig Ó Ríain (ed. and trans.), Beatha Bharra: Sain Finbarr of Cork, the Complete Life (London, 1994), pp 88–91. Fry claims that a twelve-night wake was also held for Ethne and Fedelm, the two daughters of Léigaire supposedly baptised by Patrick: Burial in Medieval Ireland, p. 82. The reference she provided, ibid., p. 254, may refer either to Colgan’s Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae or Kenny’s Sources for the Early History of Ireland. Ethne and Fedelm are treated of twice in the former work: Brendan Jennings (ed.), The Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae of John Colgan (Dublin, 1948), pp 54–6 and 415–16 (not p. 254). Their story is essentially that episode concerning them found in Tierchen’s narrative: Petitionary Texts, ed. Bieler, pp 142–5. Page 254 of Kenny’s work is partly a discussion on verse and hymns: James Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland I: Ecclesiastical (New York, 1929), p. 254. Neither Colgan nor Kenny mention a twelve-night wake in connection with Ethne and Fedelm. Fry later claims, correctly, that there were three days of mourning for Ethne and Fedelm prior to their burial: Burial in Medieval Ireland, p. 86. This particular version of Ethne’s and Fedelm’s story was taken ex cod. Ingoldstadii, that is from the manuscript that contains the Vita Terrae of Patrick: Ludwig Bieler (ed.), Four Latin Lives of St. Patrick (Dublin, 1971), pp 14–15. Fry is further mistaken to claim that Domnall mac Amalgada, comara Pthairic, was waked for twelve nights in 1108, like Brian: Burial in Medieval Ireland, pp 82–3. Domnall died on the 12 August and the annals claim that his successor, Cellaich, received orders on the 23 September (though possibly chosen before then). Fry appears to have misread August for September and assumed that Domnall was waked for the duration of the periods between the two events. Martin Holland has suggested that the six-week interval between the death and ordination may have been inspired by canonical considerations: ‘The Ordination of Cellaich, comarae Patrick, in 1105’, Seanchas Ardhaích, xx (2005) p. 22.

79 For this process (in both Irish and Norse texts), see Ni Mhaonaigh, Brian Boru, pp 81–3.
of two other Munster notables, Conaing mac Duinn Cuain and Mothla mac Fáeláin. With regard to some of the nobility slaughtered at Clontarf, it is claimed in Cogadh that it was not until Easter Monday that ‘They carried thirty of the nobles who were killed there to their territorial churches, wherever they were situated all over Erin’. No account is given of the treatment of the remainder of the dead, apart from a brief statement in which it was claimed that they subsequently buried on the field of battle every one of their slain that they could recognise.

The first of Brian’s fellow internees, Murchad, was Brian’s son by Mór, daughter of Eiden mac Cléirig of Uí Fhiachrach Aidne (Uí Fhiachrach Aidne, located in south Connacht, were one of the few kingdoms to remain loyal to Brian and accompany him to Clontarf). Murchad appears to have had a position of prominence among Dál Cais. For example, the Annals of Inisfallen record that he was joint leader of one half of Brian’s army (along with another of Brian’s sons, Domnall) that attacked Cenél Conaill in 1011 and he is associated with Brian in every annalistic text that recounts the battle of Clontarf. In Cogadh Murchad was portrayed as the supreme Munster warrior – ‘The matchless, ever victorious, Hector, of the many-nationed heroic children of Adam’ – who died alongside his own son, Tairdelbach. Murchad’s line appears to have terminated at Clontarf, and so the author of Cogadh probably felt safe to wax lyrical regarding Murchad’s role, knowing he would not appear to have favoured any one branch of Brian’s descendants over another.

Conaing, son of Donn Cuan, son of Cennétig (rigdanna of Munster, according to the Annals of Ulster and the Annals of Loch Cé), was Brian’s nephew. His title and familial connections suggest that he was extremely close to the heart of Munster power, as were a number of his descendants. Conaing’s father, Donn Cuan, had been killed by Congalach mac Main Mithig (Congalach Snogba), the last Síl nÁeda Sláine king of Tara, almost sixty-five years prior to Conaing’s own death. Conaing’s brother, Céilechair (ob. 1008), died as abbot of Tír dá Glas (Terryglass, Co. Tipperary), an important monastery on the border of Munster and the territory of the Southern Úi Néill, and was succeeded by Brian’s brother, Marcán (ob. 1010). Conaing was the eponymous ancestor of Uí Chonaing and his son (Mathgamain) and grandson (Éttrí) were both entitled rigdanna Muman on their deaths, while a further descendant, Domnall Ua Conaing (ob. 1137), was archbishop of Cashel.

Conaing’s closeness to Brian is emphasised in Cogadh, in which it is stated that Conaing was one of the three men that Brian most valued. Like Brian and Murchad, Conaing was said to have been foredoomed and he subsequently died bravely in battle, at the hands of Máel Mórda, the king of Laigin, whom he also killed. According to the Annals of Loch Cé and Annals of Boyle, however, Conaing did not take part in the battle but remained with Brian, behind the lines, praying for success. He was killed by a Norse chief, Brodar, who was also said to have killed Brian on the same occasion. Despite the discrepancies in accounts of Conaing’s actions during his and Brian’s final hours (a servant, Laidean, occupies the role of Brian’s companion according to Cogadh), he is nonetheless depicted as a close comrade of Brian in all sources. The author of Cogadh may have intended to flatter the descendants of Conaing by portraying their ancestor as both a close companion of Brian and an able fighter, even though he was at least in his mid-sixties when the battle took place. The clerics of Armagh may have sought to likewise seek favour with Conaing’s offspring, by burying Conaing with Brian, though it should be noted that there is no record of Conaing’s burial in Cogadh. All the evidence appears to point to a close relationship between Brian and Conaing and it is likely that this was indeed so, though the role ascribed to him in the battle of Clontarf, according to Cogadh, is dubious.

The final named internee, Mothla, son of Domnall son of Faelán, was not a member of Dál Cais but rather king of the Déisi Muman (located mainly in Co. Waterford) and his choice as an internee is the most puzzling. Murchad and Conaing were close kin of and certainly closely associated with Brian but, although this king of Déisi Muman fought alongside the nobles of Dál Cais, easy relations did not always exist between their two kingdoms. Mothla’s grandfather, Faelán (eponymous ancestor of Uí Fháeláin of Déisi Muman), was treated favourably in Cogadh and said to have supported Mathgamain (Brian’s elder brother) in his struggle against the Norse. But the Annals of Inismullen claim that Mathgamain had killed Faelán’s son (and Mothla’s paternal uncle), Cormac. Brian, in turn, faced opposition from Mothla’s father, Domnall. According to the Annals of Inismullen, Brian severely punished Domnall for a raid by the Déisi in 985: ‘The Déisi raided Brian’s mercenaries and took three hundred cows. And Brian harried the Déisi to avenge that, and chased Domnall, son of Faelán, as far as Port Lairge, and the whole of the Déisi was devastated’.

This incident is also found in Cogadh where the blame is also placed upon Domnall; he is said to have been banished by Brian for having forced the Dál Cais king into battle: ‘He banished him who had forced the war upon him, to wit, Domnall, the son of Faelán’. Furthermore, two years later he took hostages from Lismore, the chief church of Déisi Muman, along with hostages from the churches of Emly and Cork, which suggests that Brian had to coerce those churches, in order to enforce their compliance with his wishes. Domnall died in 996, but Mothla did not immediately succeed him and presumably only succeeded to the kingship of Déisi Muman in 1009, on the death of the incumbent, Áed. Mothla, however, is neither expressly praised nor condemned in Cogadh. His said to have led a battalion of Munstermen, along with Magnus son of Annchad, king of Uí Liatháin, which was stationed to the rear of the battalion led by 90 ibid., pp 71–2.

89 ibid., pp 172–3 and 184–5.
91 Al 975.1
92 Al 985.2.
93 Cogadh, pp 106–7.
94 Al 987.2.
95 ATg, CS s. a. 996, AF M s. a. 995.
96 Al 1009.2.
Murchad and Conaing. Nothing further is known of Mothla and he does not even feature in the Déisi genealogies, nor does his brother Diarmaid (ob. 1031).98

Among the texts that contain accounts of the burial, the Annals of Ulster, Annals of Loch Cé and Annals of the Four Masters all note that Mothla’s head was buried in Armagh, while the Annals of Boyle and Cogadh omit his interment. Mothla’s probable inclusion in the Armagh parent text behind most of the annalistic accounts (and exclusion in Cogadh) suggests that his burial was of concern to Armagh and not Dál Cais.99 It is possible that Mothla’s head was buried honourably by the Armagh clergy because they wished to ingratiate themselves with the rulers of Déisi Muman or its chief churches. A strong connection between Armagh and the churches of Déisi Muman does not appear to have existed in the tenth century; the possibly tenth-century Vita Tripartita of St Patrick is surprisingly silent with regard to Déisi Muman. Nonetheless, two important Armagh ecclesiastics appear to have died or been buried in Lismore, the chief church of Déisi Muman, during the latter part of the eleventh century and in the first half of the following century. Firstly, ‘Mael Isu Ut Brolachain of the community of Ard Macha, the venerable senior and eminent sage of Ireland, rested in Les Mor Mo-Chutu’.100 Cellach, the reforming comarba Patraic, was also buried in Lismore, according to his own wishes, after falling ill and dying in Ard Pátraic (Ardpatrick, Co. Limerick).101 A later Life of a Déisi saint, Declan of Ardmore, depicts extremely close links between Declan and Patrick and easts Declan as a ‘Patrick of the Déisi’.102 This Life, based on a twelfth-century Latin original, appears to have been intended to promote Ardmore’s claims to episcopal status and the depiction of Declan’s friendship with (and subservience to) Patrick may have simply been a means of flattering Armagh, in the hope that the latter would support Ardmore’s claims. While this later evidence may suggest that the Déisi churches of Lismore and Ardmore may have been on friendly terms with Armagh during the late eleventh and twelfth centuries, it cannot be ascertained that this was necessarily so when Mothla was killed. Indeed, since the accounts of Mothla’s burial are later than 1014, they may not actually represent an attempt by Armagh to win favour with Déisi Muman at the time of Mothla’s death, but may have been composed during the later period of increased Armagh-Déisi Muman contact.

Finally, in considering the significance of the physical location of Brian’s burial within the precincts of Armagh, it may be speculated that the placing of Brian’s body in a new tomb (i n-ailaidh nui) is reminiscent of the burial of Jesus in a freshly carved tomb.103 Following this analogy, Máel Muire is cast in the role of Joseph of Arimathea, the disciple who actively sought out Christ’s body, possibly at some risk to himself, in order to give it an honourable burial. In practical terms, the provision of a new tomb for Brian and the other slain Munstermen may have been intended to set them apart from other kings buried in Armagh. During the tenth and eleventh centuries Cenél nEógain

97 Cogadh, pp 166–7.
98 Séamus Pender (ed.), Déisi Genealogies with an Appendix of Historical References (Dublin, 1937).
99 He is not even mentioned as a participant in the battle in the account found in the Annals of Inisfallen.
100 AI 1086.2.
101 AI 1129.3, AI 1129.6. Further links between Lismore and the north of Ireland are suggested by the death of an Uíliail bishop (‘In episcop Uítae’) in Lismore, who appears to have been Aengus ua Gormáin, comarba of Congail of Benneor (Bangor) (AI 1123.4, AU 1123.3).
103 Matt 27:57–59; Luke 23:50–53; John 19:38–41. Mark 15:42–6 also has the story of the burial but does not specify a new tomb. Fry has suggested that the ‘alaid’ was a stone tomb but does not offer any convincing evidence: Burial in Medieval Ireland, pp 131–2.
kings (and potential kings) had been buried in Armagh, in a cemetery that appears to have been set aside for royalty. For example, Conchobar mac Domnaill\textsuperscript{104} and Ardgar mac Lochlainn\textsuperscript{105} were buried ‘in the cemetery/mausoleum of the kings in Armagh’ (in cimiterio regum i nArd Machal i nArd Macha in mausolio regum).

Conclusion

If the burial of Brian and his associates was a move by Armagh to consolidate its links with Brian’s successors, then it may have proved a shrewd one, as the events of the 1020s suggest. In late May 1020 fire swept through Armagh, causing enormous damage\textsuperscript{106} and Máel Muire died within a week of the event.\textsuperscript{107} Furthermore, in a seemingly separate calamity, they were robbed of relics and seven hundred cows that year.\textsuperscript{108} Máel Muire was succeeded by his son, Amalgaid, who made a great visitation of Munster the following year,\textsuperscript{109} presumably as a means of financing the rebuilding of Armagh, and who spent Easter of 1026 in Donnchad mac Briain’s residence at Cenn Corad (Kincora, Co. Clare).\textsuperscript{110}

In a possibly retrospective judgement, the records for the year 1014 in the Annals of Ulster and the Annals of Loch Cé close with the words ‘Numerous indeed are the events of this year’.\textsuperscript{111} Like the accounts of Brian’s battle itself, the details of his burial have survived in various versions that do not fully agree on the nature and sequence of the events involved. Even the sources that rely on records written by the churchmen who buried him in Armagh do not offer a uniform picture. It is a tribute to Brian’s news-worthiness and the importance attached to him by the survivors of Clontarf (ecclesiastical and lay) that his postmortem fate, like his life, was the subject of so many tellings and retellings.

Acknowledgments

I would like to express my gratitude to the following people: Dr Máire Ní Mhaonaigh of the Department of Anglo-Saxon, Norse and Celtic, University of Cambridge (for her comments on an earlier draft of this article); Paul Casey and Eimear Flavin (for their aid in procuring source materials); Katie Casey (for her comments during the writing of this article) and Adrian Cyriwsky and Natalia Viba (for their hospitality while writing this article). Needless to say, I alone may be held responsible for any mistakes and/or omissions contained herein.

\textsuperscript{104} AU 935.7 and AFM s. a. 933. Contrary to Fry’s claims, Conchobar was not a member of the O’Donnell (a later branch of Cenél Conaill) but a son of Donnall, son of Aed Findlaith, of Cenél nEógain: Burial in Medieval Ireland, p. 131. Similarly, her claim that Malachy (Mael Sechnail mac Domnail) was buried in Armagh also seems erroneous, as it relies on the testimony of Archdall’s eighteenth-century Monasticon Hibernicum (which in turn relied on the late, so-called ‘Dublin Annals of Inisfallen’).

\textsuperscript{105} AU 1064.7, AI 1064.4, ATíg, AFM, ALC s. a. 1064. Al and ATíg record his death, but not his burial.

\textsuperscript{106} AU 1020.4, AI 1020.4, CS, ATíg, ALC s. a. 1020, ACIon s. a. 1013 (the ‘Danes’ are blamed for the fire, in the latter source).

\textsuperscript{107} AU 1020.5, AI 1020.3, ATíg, ALC, CS, AFM s. a. 1020. Only the closely related Annals of Ulster and Annals of Loch Cé specify the dates of both these events.

\textsuperscript{108} ATíg, AFM s. a. 1020. It is conceivable that the fire and plundering occurred at the same time. However, since they were recorded separately in the Annals of Tigernach, it is possible that they were two separate events (the record of the plundering in the Annals of the Four Masters is similar to that found in the Annals of Tigernach and may have derived from the latter or a similar source).

\textsuperscript{109} AU 1021.5, AFM s. a. 1021.

\textsuperscript{110} AI 1026.3.

\textsuperscript{111} AU 1014.10, ALC s. a. 1014.