Out urban art project is the city's walls as a canvas world's top street artists bring skills to Limerick to transform sites

Oraw Out's Catherine O'Halloran with Elliot O'Donnell - or Askew One - on Little William Street in front of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is an attraction of a massive mural that the New Zealander worked on with rom around the world and is a second to the world and the world and the world are the world and the world and the world are the world are the world and the world are the world are the world are the world and the world are the world ar rom around the world and is an nvestment into the city, so that ounger kids that are painting can ook at this and see that creativity nd imagination is limitless."

Paul Foley, now seconded to City f Culture, says it is "one of the most accessful initiatives that we have ad throughout the year".

"It is great to see sites which ay have been dead spaces, ing brought to life by colour d creativity. The objective is to insform these sites into a more lourful and creative streetscape." Mr Foley, who worked in the vironment department before wing to a key role in City Culture, acknowledges the icational element of Draw Out. We had some difficulties maybe two years ago in terms of tagging and graffiti around the city, and this is a way of educating artists who are involved in this, that it is better to do it in a structured way," he says.

"You can do better art as a result, rather than a scribble in the middle of the night, which is vandalism. This can be far more beneficial for artists."

Catherine says that education element "is really important".

"This stuff only really makes sense when it sits against the other education and mentorship stuff that we do, because otherwise it doesn't have much meaning," she explains. "That is the foundation that runs underneath it and all of the team are local artists, who get to experience what it is like to approach a wall this big.

"That is a creative investment into the young people of Limerick, which we need to start thinking about doing more of."

Kiwi artist O'Donnell, who collaborated with Maser on the mural to the rear of Brown Thomas, says his time in Limerick has been "really productive".

"I have spent the whole year at projects just like this, it has been a continual flow," he explains. "This has been very laid back, typically lrish. I like that autonomy, the freedom to move and do things at my own pace.

"It is really nice to see this big international mural culture really thriving at the moment. It is something I am very appreciative of, because it enables me to travel to different places."

Fintan McGee from Brisbane, said the reaction to his piece on the Roches Street car park has been "overwhelmingly positive".

"Most of my work, first of all, is like a reaction to space. A lot of my work deals with environment, climate change," he explains. "I don't really use spray paint any more, it is kind of like old school muralism.

"Limerick is a city that has been through some tough times recently and is in a mode of recovery right now and I think people are excited about something that is revitalising and fresh and can make them feel proud of where they live. It has been great."

Art installation for 'iconic' Cleeve's tower

ANNE SHERIDAN

THE 'ICONIC' chimney at the old Cleeve's factory in city will be given an 'other-worldly' make-over in September - and it will be able to communicate with the masses.

Under a City of Culture project. Limerick born artist Andrew Kearney will be rigging the chimney on O'Callaghan Strand with rounded LED displays that allow the public to activate the work through their mobile phone or other internet device. The public is invited to interact with the installation through the use of applications, such as Twitter, Facebook, and QR codes.

He explained that this way each person will have the opportunity to input their own words or sentence into the custom built software, "which then transforms these in order to build a continuously growing narrative".

However, the public cannot simply input anything they like, as there will be filters in place to check the input before it gets displayed.

Originally from Limerick but living in London, Kearney has been commissioned as part of Limerick City of Culture to make a new temporary public art work entitled, Tell Me Something, which will be launched on September 25.

The work takes the form of a large white luminescent torus (ring) positioned two thirds up the height of the 52-metre chimney stack at the old factory. It is intended to be visible from throughout the city centre, and is a continuation of his ongoing research into finding ways to connect the human experience with the built and social environment.

Kearney selected the chimney stack so as to "create a dialogue between the skyline and the people of the city".

"TellMeSomething is a stimulating and visually engaging installation that captures the attention of those who live, work, visit or travel through the city of Limerick," he said.

"The enticing name itself comes from my intention to create an alternative art piece that encourages metaphorically literally the dialogue between the people and the city of Limerick, asking all to reassess our understanding of the city by introducing a new element into its otherwise familiar skyline," he explained.

During the day it passively reflects its surroundings by means of two way mirrors, but at night the LED display is brought to life. "Hovering twothirds up the height chimney, TellMeSomething's physicality is defined by its strong sense otherness animated ever-changing appearance," elaborated.

It is intended. he said, to urge the viewer to look on the progression of Limerick from economic and industrial stagnation to being a hub of technological research & development. Born in 1961, he studied Fine Art at the Limerick College of Art and Design, and then went on to Chelsea College of Art and Design.

public to interact with his creation at the former Cleeve's factory, as they can input messages for display on the LED displays imerick' project showcase in City Hall

i local drama and performance.
iday's event - to take place from m - will award groups a chance howcase to the public their iming projects that are yet to place.

s we are in the final half of ear, this will be a fascinating sion for the public to see our tment in indigenous projects all over Limerick, so far," ined Sheila Deegan, arts and re manager of City of Culture.

have seen some amazing ats unfold over the past six is, and we have yet to see more fascinating projects as f Culture comes to a close in final few months.

encourage all Made in ick projects to participate event and to present their In all, City of Culture received a total of 328 applications with a request for over €8m in funding through the Made in Limerick strand.

109 projects were selected after a "competitive round", 102 of which are locally based. In total some €2.3m was awarded, in addition to a further €1.1m which was ring fenced for 'Legacy and Commissioning' projects, also to be locally led, according to City of Culture.

This brings to €3.4m - or 57% - of the total Government contribution that is going to local groups.

A large number of spectacular events have taken place as a result, including the ICO's Carmen, the Limerick Spring festival, the Culture Cardon Alexander

