symptoms of your sickness. You heard the possible solutions and the possible cures and similar experiences that a lifetime of oral tradition had passed on. You heard "Mrs. Barrett made an appointment to visit you later, and that added to the luxury of your case. She would never call empty-handed. She, as a rule, would sit on the bed while your mother and after they had talked a little with you, they would lapse into a chatter of their own. But not before Mrs. Barrett had given you something, something to buy, something for yourself when you are up and away again. You could drift into half slumber and wake again, and when you opened your eyes her poor talking away as before, but her eyes would never have left your face. You lay there all but at such times. It was a time to think and to wonder at the pleasure of being loved.
