past 3 M Grevy in the Chamber the Senate opened the sitting. Galleries for the public were in the Chamber of Deputies earliness of the faces on his accusatory occasions. Evidently taken by surprise and only when it was discovered that the place its place in history. When seated, the Deputies crowded in of access and hastily regained there was then a deep silence. Manifestly under the influence of and with a firm voice read the President of the Republic. It was at the opening of this Session the before you a programme of measures satisfying public opinion, could be effected without danger to the security of the country. Waiving, as I had given it my entire approval, was not sacrificing any of the which my conscience bound me to

The Cabinet, in the belief of the opinion of the majority in the now proposes to me as regards demands general measures which I to the interests of the army, and those of the country. I cannot demur. In view of this refusal the Senate. Any other Cabinet taken from the Chambers would impose the burden on me. I accordingly think it fitting the duration of the trust with the National Assembly invested me: I in the identity of the Republic. In leaving me the consolation of believing that the years I have devoted to the service as a soldier and as a citizen I have been aided by other sentiments than those of duty and by perfect devotion to my country, I beg you, sir, to inform the Senate (or the Deputies) of my decision." There was a great demonstration. The Left were respectful, the Right little favourable to whom they blame for not doing that he did to-day, did not venture on retirement and would not approve. It was a strange picture, and drew forth many reflections.
