In the city civil court the cause of Sullivan against Tuckey for a breach of promise of marriage, occupied the court from four o'clock until nine at night on Friday. It appeared that the plaintiff was a servant in the house of the father of the defendant, receiving the wages of two guineas a year—the young gentleman had just returned from college, and having become deeply enamoured with his fair desdemona, wrote some very loving letters, which did much more credit to the gallantry of his heart than the sagacity of his head—it appeared that the birth of a lovely babe was the consequence of their attachment—in consequence of the interference of his friends, the young gentleman was induced to give up all hopes of enjoying Miss Sullivan as his bride—but she was determined not to be treated so cavalierly with impunity, and therefore brought her action. Mr. Serjeant M'Mahon, in a very able speech, maintained that the maid was the seducer and the young man the seduced. but the jury, it seems, thought otherwise: for they returned a verdict for 100 guineas against the defendant.
