

of that great magic to its mighty proportions; and, although circumstances have been allowed to take place which were but too well calculated to alienate the feelings you once cultivated so warmly in the interests of the Atlantic Company, and to cool the ardour of your zeal in its behalf, we beg leave to remind you that we, at least, have been no parties to any such proceedings.

"We appeal then with confidence to that well-tryed friendship for the working and trading classes of Galway in which they have ever trusted, and by which they have been never deceived, that you will present yourself once more the special representative of those interests of those which are so deeply involved in the success of the company, after the manner which to your judgment shall seem most fit, to gather up if possible the broken threads of confidence in, and conciliation with, the project, and try and restore its present dislocated condition to former success and healthy position before the Government and the country.

"M. J. TYERNEY, Chairman.

"Galway, 20th May, 1861."

The Rev. Gentleman replied in a speech of great ability, in the course of which he reviewed every incident connected with the packet station from its foundation to the cancelling of the contract. During the delivery of his speech he was loudly cheered, and when he announced his readiness to enter public life again in the service of his fellow-townsmen, and to start for London by the four o'clock train this day, the enthusiasm of the meeting was intense. He said he would be a beggar—nay, if necessary, an intruder to forward their interests. He condemned the management from the commencement of the packet station, and said that over-paid and inefficient officials ought at any sacrifice to be dispensed with. The railway terminus, now at ten minutes to four, is crowded with hundreds waiting to see the rev. gentleman take the train.

SAILING OF THE PRINCE ALBERT.

This vessel will sail at six o'clock this evening. She has 300 steerage passengers, and 14 first class, with a fair cargo.

Since the commencement of the Packet station so many females did not leave this, and they are all a fine, comely set of young women.

On Sunday last the funeral of a soldier of the Papal Brigade, named Thomas Conway, who died in Clonmel hospital, took place, and the cortege, which comprised about 5,000 persons, paraded the principal streets. The coffin was drawn on a hearse, covered with a black velvet pall, and the centre was ornamented with the Papal arms. On the lid of the shell were placed a sword and helmet, such as that presumed to have been worn by the subalterns of the Pope's army. The band of the Trades' Society performed the "Dead March in Saul" and other martial requiems at the funeral, which was attended by some clergymen and several members of the Corporation.

On Saturday, the 11th instant, as some children were playing in the garden at the rear of the house in the Infantry Barrack Square, Waterford, occupied by Mr. Beazley, Barrack Sergeant, they found at the foot of a tree of small pial containing prussic acid; one of the children, a little girl about six years old, poured some of the contents down the throat of a fine little fellow, one of Mr. Beazley's children, and also some of the poisonous fluid ran down his chest, inside his clothes, and, of course, burnt him dreadfully. Immediate medical aid was procured, but in vain, for the child who was five years old, lingered until the following Saturday, when death put a period to the excruciating tortures of the little innocent. By permission of the Coroner, who was unable to hold an inquest on Sunday, Mr. Beazley interred his child at the Abbey Church on that evening. The funeral was attended by a very large number of the citizens.

An idiotic boy named Quilligan, was dreadfully burnt at Ballyerra, county Clare. The poor creature was left alone in his father's cabin, and falling into the fire was dreadfully and fatally injured; he died in the Ennis workhouse hospital on Saturday evening.

The old and celebrated market-house of Tuam, was levelled on Friday last, having withstood the "battle and the breeze" for nearly two centuries. The plague raged in Galway in 1742, and the assizes were held in the then old market-house of Tuam, and many a time and oft did its old walls resound with the thunders of O'Connell's eloquence.

A dishonest bill poster was sent to jail for 6 months by the Belfast magistrates, for breach of contract by not posting up 150 bills on the dead walls of the city, announcing the sailing of steamers and departure of trains.

The quantity of sea weed conveyed into Tuam for manure for the potatoe crop this year is said to be fabulous, as to its extent.
